Photographs

Since I began painting, I have taken thousands of photographs of images ranging from old magic manuals and physics books, to medical literature, menus and advertisements. More often than not, these photographic negatives served as image sources for my paintings.

One day, the painter James Nares visited the studio and was curious about these black and white film negatives that had acquired a thick patina of paint just by being in the studio. When I explained that they were my image library, he suggested that they were photographic works in themselves and should be printed as such.

I have followed up on his suggestion and had the original 35mm negatives scanned. Because of the paint, scratches and cracks that have accumulated on the negatives, the computer starts to not understand what it is looking at and starts to throw random, intense psychedelic colors at the screen because it is misreading the surface depth of the negatives. The results, which are accidental, are printed as is.
